About Codebreakers: The Inside Story Of Bletchley Park Writer

The influence of Ultra--the code-name used in the Second World War for the product of the decryption of the more important enemy ciphers--is a subject that calls for two different kinds of enquiry. The records began to be available during the s, so that we now have the essential evidence for the direct or the immediate influence it exerted; and, so long as we have proper regard for the rules of historical enquiry, we can establish what that influence was with reasonable accuracy. This is not yet the case, at least in the United Kingdom, for the war in Codebreakers: The Inside Story of Bletchley Park Far East, which is therefore excluded from this analysis. We know what information Ultra provided and when it reached its recipients. We know the Codebreakers: The Inside Story of Bletchley Park and the extent of such other intelligence as was then at their disposal. And, although there are few contemporary accounts of what they thought of it and did with it, we know what appreciations, orders, and actions, and sometimes what discussions, followed its receipt. But because the very existence of Ultra remained a closely guarded secret until the s, its influence was unknown to, or unmentionable by, the compilers of contemporary reports and the authors of the standard histories and the memoirs that were published before that time. These reports and these accounts already incorporate the contribution Ultra made to the course of events but they do not acknowledge it. The purpose of the historical enquiry is thus to identify that contribution and, to this extent, to put Ultra into the existing accounts. But this cannot be the sole aim of the investigation.
